Dear Parents:

Recent statistics suggest that virtually all teens have smartphones and are online every day. About half of teens are online almost constantly. This has raised concerns about the effects of excessive screen time.

In a recent blog post, Dr. Daniel Amen cited a study by the National Institutes of Health based on brain scans of 4,500 children. Children whose daily screen time exceeded 7 hours showed premature thinning of the brain's cortex. He also referred to other studies showing that excessive screen time is associated with mental health issues such as depression, anxiety, and low self-esteem.

For years, Love and Logic has advocated limiting screen time for kids of all ages, and these studies support this approach. Although the basics of parenting remain the same, issues involving technology and screen time have left many parents wondering what limits are appropriate, how to hold their children accountable for misuse of technology, and how to help kids learn the decision-making skills required to make healthy technology choices when they leave home.

♥ The following principles can help parents limit screen time for their kids.

- Kids need limits.
- Limits are best set through actions instead of hollow threats.
- When kids make poor decisions, they need to experience natural or logical consequences.
- Consequences are always more effective when provided with loving empathy.
- Our kids will learn how to live their lives by watching us.

♥ Because limits are at the core of these principles, here are some examples of 'essential' limits:

- You may have your tablet if there is no arguing when I ask you to shut it off.
- Feel free to have a cell phone when you can pay for the entire cost.
- We allow kids to have devices with access to the Internet if they check them in with us each night. We'll return them in the morning if there are no problems.
- I've met plenty of good people who've ended up doing bad things on the internet. That's why your mom has all my passwords and is free to see my history. You may have this device if you do the same. Everyone needs someone to hold them accountable.
- I'm shutting my phone off so that I can give you 100% of my attention. Thanks for doing the same.
